The in vivo and in vitro T cell proliferative responses to the polyclonal mitogens concanavalin A and phytohemagglutinin were studied in weanling and adult rats fed either a casein-based (control) diet or a protein-deficient (6% protein) diet for 28 days, following depletion of calcium in the diet or both depletion of calcium and protein. Thymus and spleen weights were decreased in both protein-depleted animals and those deprived of both calcium and protein. The in vivo and in vitro proliferative responses of lymphocytes to concanavalin A and phytohemagglutinin were significantly depressed following calcium or protein depletion. However, when calcium depletion was combined with protein deprivation, the proliferative responses of lymphocytes to concanavalin A and phytohemagglutinin were similar to control values, indicating the nutritional independence of the effects of these dietary variables. Addition of supplemental calcium to the diets of the control, protein-depleted, and calcium-depleted, protein-depleted animals was associated with decreased T cell proliferative responses to concanavalin A and phytohemagglutinin and a concomitant increase in the number of suppressor cells.
